

Climate Conversation: Kenya

“Africa is, in fact, the area of the world that is going to suffer the most from climate change...That is a moral tragedy because Africans have contributed almost nothing to the problem. We from the temperate zones have got to seriously consider what we’re doing to actually help farmers and communities to adapt to conditions that they didn’t cause—we caused.”

—Dr. Dennis Garrity, Director General, World Agroforestry Center, U.S.A

For millions of subsistence farmers in Kenya, climate change is not a political debate. It is a reality in which adaptation can mean the difference between life and death.

Climate Conversation: Kenya is a four-part video series featuring on-the-ground footage and interviews from Kenya highlighting issues of climate change and environmental stewardship. It’s a chance to meet people, not statistics; to hear stories, not arguments. It is an invitation to a conversation.

climate-conversation.org
#climateconversation

Climate Conversation: Kenya

Join the conversation:
climate-conversation.org
#climateconversation

